

The laws of this country should reflect the will of the people, not of the major media conglomerates. Their heavy-handed tactics to block access of media to the average consumer not only punishes the vast majority of law-abiding citizens, it curtails innovation in the marketplace, making the U.S. less competitive and less profitable on a global scale. The supply of digital television must not artificially affect the demand. I, along with the rest of the citizens of this country demand the right to record and playback digital television without any constraints.
